
AN OCCURRENCE AT OWL CREEK BRIDGE
Annotated Edition
AMBROSE BIERCE
Edited by Mike Vendetti

Contents

1. Copyright

2. About This Edition

3. An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge

4. Behind the Story

5. Reading Notes

6. Questions for Discussion

7. About Ambrose Bierce

8. Sources and Further Reading

9. More Classics from Mike Vendetti

Copyright

An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge

by Ambrose Bierce

Annotated Edition

Edited by Mike Vendetti

Ambrose Bierce’s “An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge” was first published in the San Francisco Examiner on July 13, 1890, and collected in Tales of Soldiers and Civilians (1891). The story is in the public domain in the United States.

Annotations, essay, reading notes, discussion questions, and biography © 2026 Mike Vendetti. All rights reserved in this edition’s editorial text and presentation.

Published by Booth Ready Productions

First Kindle edition, 2026

About This Edition

“An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge” is one of the most famous short stories in American literature. A man stands on a railroad bridge in northern Alabama with a rope around his neck, waiting for a sergeant to step off a plank. What follows takes only a few pages and has been read, taught, filmed, and imitated for more than a century.

This edition is complete. Every paragraph of Bierce’s story appears in its original order, in his own words. The only changes are small ones: spellings are brought into line with modern American usage (“judgment,” “mustache”), compound words are hyphenated consistently, and three obvious typesetting errors in the commonly circulated text are corrected (“an hand” to “a hand,” “had not wish” to “had no wish,” and “in few moments” to “in a few moments”).

Bierce’s Peyton Farquhar is a slave owner and a committed secessionist, and the story says so plainly. Those details are left exactly as written. They are part of what Bierce wants the reader to weigh while watching this man die.

The story also describes a hanging in close physical detail. Readers who prefer to know that in advance now do.

After the story you’ll find a short essay on its background, reading notes for each of its three parts, questions for discussion, and a biography of Bierce. The notes are kept out of the story itself so that it reads without interruption, the way Bierce meant it to: straight through, in one sitting.

— Mike Vendetti

An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge

by Ambrose Bierce

I

A man stood upon a railroad bridge in northern Alabama, looking down into the swift water twenty feet below. The man's hands were behind his back, the wrists bound with a cord. A rope closely encircled his neck. It was attached to a stout cross-timber above his head and the slack fell to the level of his knees. Some loose boards laid upon the ties supporting the rails of the railway supplied a footing for him and his executioners—two private soldiers of the Federal army, directed by a sergeant who in civil life may have been a deputy sheriff. At a short remove upon the same temporary platform was an officer in the uniform of his rank, armed. He was a captain. A sentinel at each end of the bridge stood with his rifle in the position known as "support," that is to say, vertical in front of the left shoulder, the hammer resting on the forearm thrown straight across the chest—a formal and unnatural position, enforcing an erect carriage of the body. It did not appear to be the duty of these two men to know what was occurring at the center of the bridge; they merely blockaded the two ends of the foot planking that traversed it.

Beyond one of the sentinels nobody was in sight; the railroad ran straight away into a forest for a hundred yards, then, curving, was lost to view. Doubtless there was an outpost farther along. The other bank of the stream was open ground—a gentle slope topped with a stockade of vertical tree trunks, loopholed for rifles, with a single embrasure through which protruded the muzzle of a brass cannon commanding the bridge. Midway up the slope between the bridge and fort were the spectators—a single company of infantry in line, at "parade rest," the butts of their rifles on the ground, the barrels inclining slightly backward against the right shoulder, the hands crossed upon the stock. A lieutenant stood at the right of the line, the point of his sword upon the ground, his left hand resting upon his right. Excepting the group of four at the center of the bridge, not a man moved. The company faced the bridge, staring stonily, motionless. The sentinels, facing the banks of the stream, might have been statues to adorn the bridge. The captain stood with folded arms, silent, observing the work of his subordinates, but making no sign. Death is a dignitary who when he comes announced is to be received with formal manifestations of respect, even by those most familiar with him. In the code of military etiquette silence and fixity are forms of deference.

The man who was engaged in being hanged was apparently about thirty-five years of age. He was a civilian, if one might judge from his habit, which was that of a planter. His features were good—a straight nose, firm mouth, broad forehead, from which his long, dark hair was combed straight back, falling behind his ears to the collar of his well-fitting frock coat. He wore a mustache and pointed beard, but no whiskers; his eyes were large and dark gray, and had a kindly expression which one would hardly have expected in one whose neck was in the hemp. Evidently this was no vulgar assassin. The liberal military code makes provision for hanging many kinds of persons, and gentlemen are not excluded.

The preparations being complete, the two private soldiers stepped aside and each drew away the plank upon which he had been standing. The sergeant turned to the captain, saluted and placed himself immediately behind that officer, who in turn moved apart one pace. These movements left the condemned man and the sergeant standing on the two ends of the same plank, which spanned three of the cross-ties of the bridge. The end upon which the civilian stood almost, but not quite, reached a fourth. This plank had been held in place by the weight of the captain; it was now held by that of the sergeant. At a signal from the former the latter would step aside, the plank would tilt and the condemned man go down between two ties. The arrangement commended itself to his judgment as simple and effective. His face had not been covered nor his eyes bandaged. He looked a moment at his "unsteadfast footing," then let his gaze wander to the swirling water of the stream racing madly beneath his feet. A piece of dancing driftwood caught his attention and his eyes followed it down the current. How slowly it appeared to move! What a sluggish stream!

He closed his eyes in order to fix his last thoughts upon his wife and children. The water, touched to gold by the early sun, the brooding mists under the banks at some distance down the stream, the fort, the soldiers, the piece of drift—all had distracted him. And now he became conscious of a new disturbance. Striking through the thought of his dear ones was sound which he could neither ignore nor understand, a sharp, distinct, metallic percussion like the stroke of a blacksmith's hammer upon the anvil; it had the same ringing quality. He wondered what it was, and whether immeasurably distant or near by—it seemed both. Its recurrence was regular, but as slow as the tolling of a death knell. He awaited each new stroke with impatience and—he knew not why—apprehension. The intervals of silence grew progressively longer; the delays became maddening. With their greater infrequency the sounds increased in strength and sharpness. They hurt his ear like the thrust of a knife; he feared he would shriek. What he heard was the ticking of his watch.

He unclosed his eyes and saw again the water below him. "If I could free my hands," he thought, "I might throw off the noose and spring into the stream. By diving I could evade the bullets and, swimming vigorously, reach the bank, take to the woods and get away home. My home, thank God, is as yet outside their lines; my wife and little ones are still beyond the invader's farthest advance."

As these thoughts, which have here to be set down in words, were flashed into the doomed man's brain rather than evolved from it the captain nodded to the sergeant. The sergeant stepped aside.

II

Peyton Farquhar was a well-to-do planter, of an old and highly respected Alabama family. Being a slave owner and like other slave owners a politician, he was naturally an original secessionist and ardently devoted to the Southern cause. Circumstances of an imperious nature, which it is unnecessary to relate here, had prevented him from taking service with that gallant army which had fought the disastrous campaigns ending with the fall of Corinth, and he chafed under the inglorious restraint, longing for the release of his energies, the larger life of the soldier, the opportunity for distinction. That opportunity, he felt, would come, as it comes to all in wartime. Meanwhile he did what he could. No service was too humble for him to perform in the aid of the South, no adventure too perilous for him to undertake if consistent with the character of a civilian who was at heart a soldier, and who in good faith and without too much qualification assented to at least a part of the frankly villainous dictum that all is fair in love and war.

One evening while Farquhar and his wife were sitting on a rustic bench near the entrance to his grounds, a gray-clad soldier rode up to the gate and asked for a drink of water. Mrs. Farquhar was only too happy to serve him with her own white hands. While she was fetching the water her husband approached the dusty horseman and inquired eagerly for news from the front.

“The Yanks are repairing the railroads,” said the man, “and are getting ready for another advance. They have reached the Owl Creek bridge, put it in order and built a stockade on the north bank. The commandant has issued an order, which is posted everywhere, declaring that any civilian caught interfering with the railroad, its bridges, tunnels, or trains will be summarily hanged. I saw the order."

"How far is it to the Owl Creek bridge?" Farquhar asked.

"About thirty miles."

"Is there no force on this side of the creek?"

"Only a picket post half a mile out, on the railroad, and a single sentinel at this end of the bridge."

"Suppose a man—a civilian and student of hanging—should elude the picket post and perhaps get the better of the sentinel," said Farquhar, smiling, "what could he accomplish?"

The soldier reflected. "I was there a month ago," he replied. "I observed that the flood of last winter had lodged a great quantity of driftwood against the wooden pier at this end of the bridge. It is now dry and would burn like tinder."

The lady had now brought the water, which the soldier drank. He thanked her ceremoniously, bowed to her husband and rode away. An hour later, after nightfall, he repassed the plantation, going northward in the direction from which he had come. He was a Federal scout.

III

As Peyton Farquhar fell straight downward through the bridge he lost consciousness and was as one already dead. From this state he was awakened—ages later, it seemed to him—by the pain of a sharp pressure upon his throat, followed by a sense of suffocation. Keen, poignant agonies seemed to shoot from his neck downward through every fiber of his body and limbs. These pains appeared to flash along well-defined lines of ramification and to beat with an inconceivably rapid periodicity. They seemed like streams of pulsating fire heating him to an intolerable temperature. As to his head, he was conscious of nothing but a feeling of fullness—of congestion. These sensations were unaccompanied by thought. The intellectual part of his nature was already effaced; he had power only to feel, and feeling was torment. He was conscious of motion. Encompassed in a luminous cloud, of which he was now merely the fiery heart, without material substance, he swung through unthinkable arcs of oscillation, like a vast pendulum. Then all at once, with terrible suddenness, the light about him shot upward with the noise of a loud splash; a frightful roaring was in his ears, and all was cold and dark. The power of thought was restored; he knew that the rope had broken and he had fallen into the stream. There was no additional strangulation; the noose about his neck was already suffocating him and kept the water from his lungs. To die of hanging at the bottom of a river!—the idea seemed to him ludicrous. He opened his eyes in the darkness and saw above him a gleam of light, but how distant, how inaccessible! He was still sinking, for the light became fainter and fainter until it was a mere glimmer. Then it began to grow and brighten, and he knew that he was rising toward the surface—knew it with reluctance, for he was now very comfortable. “To be hanged and drowned,” he thought,

“that is not so bad; but I do not wish to be shot. No; I will not be shot; that is not fair.”

He was not conscious of an effort, but a sharp pain in his wrist apprised him that he was trying to free his hands. He gave the struggle his attention, as an idler might observe the feat of a juggler, without interest in the outcome. What splendid effort!—what magnificent, what superhuman strength! Ah, that was a fine endeavor! Bravo! The cord fell away; his arms parted and floated upward, the hands dimly seen on each side in the growing light. He watched them with a new interest as first one and then the other pounced upon the noose at his neck. They tore it away and thrust it fiercely aside, its undulations resembling those of a water snake. “Put it back, put it back!” He thought he shouted these words to his hands, for the undoing of the noose had been succeeded by the direst pang that he had yet experienced. His neck ached horribly; his brain was on fire, his heart, which had been fluttering faintly, gave a great leap, trying to force itself out at his mouth. His whole body was racked and wrenched with an insupportable anguish! But his disobedient hands gave no heed to the command. They beat the water vigorously with quick, downward strokes, forcing him to the surface. He felt his head emerge; his eyes were blinded by the sunlight; his chest expanded convulsively, and with a supreme and crowning agony his lungs engulfed a great draught of air, which instantly he expelled in a shriek!

He was now in full possession of his physical senses. They were, indeed, preternaturally keen and alert. Something in the awful disturbance of his organic system had so exalted and refined them that they made record of things never before perceived. He felt the ripples upon his face and heard their separate sounds as they struck. He looked at the forest on the bank of the stream, saw the individual trees, the leaves and the veining of each leaf—he saw the very insects upon them: the locusts, the brilliant-bodied flies, the gray spiders stretching their webs from twig to twig. He noted the prismatic colors in all the dewdrops upon a million blades of grass. The humming of the gnats that danced above the eddies of the stream, the beating of the dragonflies' wings, the strokes of the water spiders' legs, like oars which had lifted their boat—all these made audible music. A fish slid along beneath his eyes and he heard the rush of its body parting the water.

He had come to the surface facing down the stream; in a moment the visible world seemed to wheel slowly round, himself the pivotal point, and he saw the bridge, the fort, the soldiers upon the bridge, the captain, the sergeant, the two privates, his executioners. They were in silhouette against the blue sky. They shouted and gesticulated, pointing at him. The captain had drawn his pistol, but did not fire; the others were unarmed. Their movements were grotesque and horrible, their forms gigantic.

Suddenly he heard a sharp report and something struck the water smartly within a few inches of his head, spattering his face with spray. He heard a second report, and saw one of the sentinels with his rifle at his shoulder, a light cloud of blue smoke rising from the muzzle. The man in the water saw the eye of the man on the bridge gazing into his own through the sights of the rifle. He observed that it was a gray eye and remembered having read that gray eyes were keenest, and that all famous marksmen had them. Nevertheless, this one had missed.

A counter-swirl had caught Farquhar and turned him half round; he was again looking at the forest on the bank opposite the fort. The sound of a clear, high voice in a monotonous singsong now rang out behind him and came across the water with a distinctness that pierced and subdued all other sounds, even the beating of the ripples in his ears. Although no soldier, he had frequented camps enough to know the dread significance of that deliberate, drawling, aspirated chant; the lieutenant on shore was taking a part in the morning's work. How coldly and pitilessly—with what an even, calm intonation, presaging, and enforcing tranquility in the men—with what accurately measured interval fell those cruel words:

"Company!… Attention!… Shoulder arms!… Ready!… Aim!… Fire!"

Farquhar dived—dived as deeply as he could. The water roared in his ears like the voice of Niagara, yet he heard the dull thunder of the volley and, rising again toward the surface, met shining bits of metal, singularly flattened, oscillating slowly downward. Some of them touched him on the face and hands, then fell away, continuing their descent. One lodged between his collar and neck; it was uncomfortably warm and he snatched it out.

As he rose to the surface, gasping for breath, he saw that he had been a long time under water; he was perceptibly farther downstream—nearer to safety. The soldiers had almost finished reloading; the metal ramrods flashed all at once in the sunshine as they were drawn from the barrels, turned in the air, and thrust into their sockets. The two sentinels fired again, independently and ineffectually.

The hunted man saw all this over his shoulder; he was now swimming vigorously with the current. His brain was as energetic as his arms and legs; he thought with the rapidity of lightning:

"The officer," he reasoned, "will not make that martinet's error a second time. It is as easy to dodge a volley as a single shot. He has probably already given the command to fire at will. God help me, I cannot dodge them all!"

An appalling splash within two yards of him was followed by a loud, rushing sound, diminuendo, which seemed to travel back through the air to the fort and died in an explosion which stirred the very river to its deeps! A rising sheet of water curved over him, fell down upon him, blinded him, strangled him! The cannon had taken a hand in the game. As he shook his head free from the commotion of the smitten water he heard the deflected shot humming through the air ahead, and in an instant it was cracking and smashing the branches in the forest beyond.

"They will not do that again," he thought; "the next time they will use a charge of grape. I must keep my eye upon the gun; the smoke will apprise me—the report arrives too late; it lags behind the missile. That is a good gun."

Suddenly he felt himself whirled round and round—spinning like a top. The water, the banks, the forests, the now distant bridge, fort and men, all were commingled and blurred. Objects were represented by their colors only; circular horizontal streaks of color—that was all he saw. He had been caught in a vortex and was being whirled on with a velocity of advance and gyration that made him giddy and sick. In a few moments he was flung upon the gravel at the foot of the left bank of the stream—the southern bank—and behind a projecting point which concealed him from his enemies. The sudden arrest of his motion, the abrasion of one of his hands on the gravel, restored him, and he wept with delight. He dug his fingers into the sand, threw it over himself in handfuls and audibly blessed it. It looked like diamonds, rubies, emeralds; he could think of nothing beautiful which it did not resemble. The trees upon the bank were giant garden plants; he noted a definite order in their arrangement, inhaled the fragrance of their blooms. A strange roseate light shone through the spaces among their trunks and the wind made in their branches the music of Aeolian harps. He had no wish to perfect his escape—he was content to remain in that enchanting spot until retaken.

A whiz and a rattle of grapeshot among the branches high above his head roused him from his dream. The baffled cannoneer had fired him a random farewell. He sprang to his feet, rushed up the sloping bank, and plunged into the forest.

All that day he traveled, laying his course by the rounding sun. The forest seemed interminable; nowhere did he discover a break in it, not even a woodman's road. He had not known that he lived in so wild a region. There was something uncanny in the revelation.

By nightfall he was fatigued, footsore, famished. The thought of his wife and children urged him on. At last he found a road which led him in what he knew to be the right direction. It was as wide and straight as a city street, yet it seemed untraveled. No fields bordered it, no dwelling anywhere. Not so much as the barking of a dog suggested human habitation. The black bodies of the trees formed a straight wall on both sides, terminating on the horizon in a point, like a diagram in a lesson in perspective. Overhead, as he looked up through this rift in the wood, shone great golden stars looking unfamiliar and grouped in strange constellations. He was sure they were arranged in some order which had a secret and malign significance. The wood on either side was full of singular noises, among which—once, twice, and again—he distinctly heard whispers in an unknown tongue.

His neck was in pain, and lifting his hand to it found it horribly swollen. He knew that it had a circle of black where the rope had bruised it. His eyes felt congested; he could no longer close them. His tongue was swollen with thirst; he relieved its fever by thrusting it forward from between his teeth into the cold air. How softly the turf had carpeted the untraveled avenue—he could no longer feel the roadway beneath his feet!

Doubtless, despite his suffering, he had fallen asleep while walking, for now he sees another scene—perhaps he has merely recovered from a delirium. He stands at the gate of his own home. All is as he left it, and all bright and beautiful in the morning sunshine. He must have traveled the entire night. As he pushes open the gate and passes up the wide white walk, he sees a flutter of female garments; his wife, looking fresh and cool and sweet, steps down from the veranda to meet him. At the bottom of the steps she stands waiting, with a smile of ineffable joy, an attitude of matchless grace and dignity. Ah, how beautiful she is! He springs forward with extended arms. As he is about to clasp her he feels a stunning blow upon the back of the neck; a blinding white light blazes all about him with a sound like the shock of a cannon—then all is darkness and silence!

Peyton Farquhar was dead; his body, with a broken neck, swung gently from side to side beneath the timbers of the Owl Creek bridge.

Behind the Story

“An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge” first appeared in the San Francisco Examiner on July 13, 1890. A year later Bierce gathered it into Tales of Soldiers and Civilians, the collection he revised, enlarged, and retitled In the Midst of Life in 1898.

Bierce wrote about the Civil War as someone who had fought in it. In April 1862 his regiment, the 9th Indiana, fought on the second day at Shiloh, in southwestern Tennessee. The western edge of that battlefield is a stream called Owl Creek. After Shiloh, the Union Army took the railroad junction at Corinth, Mississippi, and for months afterward Bierce’s regiment guarded and repaired the railroads around it. That is the world of the story: Federal troops rebuilding Southern rail lines, and civilians tempted to tear them down.

The literary scholar David M. Owens has pointed out that no Owl Creek crosses the railroads of northern Alabama. Bierce, who knew that country well, seems to have borrowed the name of the creek he remembered from Shiloh and set it on a fictional bridge. Owens also notes that the only hanging Bierce is known to have witnessed took place near Murfreesboro, Tennessee, where two Union soldiers were executed for murder in front of their own troops. Its circumstances were nothing like Farquhar’s, but Bierce had stood in that formation and watched.

That experience may explain the voice of Part I. Bierce describes the execution the way a soldier would describe a drill: who stands where, how the rifles are held, which plank tilts. The coldness is the point. “Death is a dignitary,” he writes, and the soldiers receive him with perfect manners while a man is killed in front of them.

The structure does the rest. Part I stops at the moment the sergeant steps aside. Part II goes backward to explain how Farquhar got there, and ends with a single quiet sentence that changes everything before it. Part III picks up the fall, and from there the story carries the reader along with Farquhar, through the river, the gunfire, the forest, and the long road home. Near the end, the verbs shift without warning into the present tense. Bierce had already planted the clue in Part I, when the ticking of a watch slowed into the tolling of a bell: in the mind of a dying man, a second can stretch into a day.

Bierce did not invent the idea of a lifetime passing in an instant. Writers had imagined it for centuries, and Charles Dickens’s sketch “A Visit to Newgate” includes a condemned man who dreams of escape on the night before his execution. But Bierce’s version became the model for everything that followed. It is often cited as an influence on William Golding’s Pincher Martin (1956), and it shaped a whole family of stories in which the narrative runs on after the moment of death.

In the early 1960s the French director Robert Enrico adapted the story as La rivière du hibou, released in English as An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge. It won the short film prize at the Cannes Film Festival and the Academy Award for Best Live Action Short Film, and in 1964 it was broadcast in the United States as an episode of The Twilight Zone.

More than a century after it was written, the story still asks the question it opened with. The state has a procedure for death, with ranks, signals, and a schedule. The person at the end of the rope has only his own clock. Bierce gives us both, side by side, and lets us feel the distance between them.

Reading Notes

These notes explain words, customs, and references that may be unfamiliar. They are grouped by the story’s three parts and follow the order of the text.

I

the Federal army. The Union Army. Bierce, a Union veteran, uses the term his side used.

“support.” A drill position in which the soldier holds his rifle upright against the left shoulder, the forearm across the chest. Bierce explains it himself, then adds that it is “formal and unnatural,” a hint of how he regards the whole ceremony.

stockade … loopholed … embrasure. A stockade is a wall of upright logs. Loopholes are narrow slits for firing rifles through it; an embrasure is a wider opening for a cannon.

“parade rest.” A standing position at ease in formation, the rifle butt on the ground. The soldiers are spectators, required to watch.

habit. Clothing. Farquhar is dressed as a planter, which tells the soldiers he is a man of property.

in the hemp. In the noose. Hanging rope was made of hemp fiber.

“unsteadfast footing.” Bierce quotes Shakespeare. In Henry IV, Part 1, Hotspur compares a dangerous venture to crossing a roaring current “on the unsteadfast footing of a spear.”

death knell. The slow tolling of a church bell to announce a death. The ticking watch sounding like a knell is the first sign that time is behaving strangely in Farquhar’s mind.

II

an original secessionist. One who favored Alabama’s leaving the Union from the start, before the war began. Alabama seceded in January 1861.

the fall of Corinth. Corinth, Mississippi, was a vital railroad crossing. Confederate forces abandoned it to the Union Army in late May 1862, after the Battle of Shiloh. Bierce’s own regiment was part of that campaign.

all is fair in love and war. An old proverb; an early form of it appears in John Lyly’s Euphues (1578). Bierce calls it “frankly villainous,” and notes that Farquhar accepts at least part of it.

gray-clad. Wearing the gray uniform of the Confederate army.

picket post … sentinel. A picket is a small advance guard posted to warn of an enemy; a sentinel is a single soldier on guard duty.

a civilian and student of hanging. Farquhar is joking. The irony is Bierce’s.

a Federal scout. A Union soldier sent to gather information, here wearing a Confederate uniform. The order he describes, and the driftwood he mentions, are bait.

III

ramification … periodicity. Branching, and regular repetition. Bierce describes pain spreading along the nerves and pulsing in rapid rhythm, in the language of a medical textbook.

preternaturally. Beyond what is natural.

gray eyes were keenest. A popular belief of the time, not a scientific fact. Bierce gives it to Farquhar as a passing thought, the kind a mind grabs in a crisis.

a clear, high voice … aspirated chant. The drawn-out, breathy cadence of an officer calling commands across a distance, so that every man hears each word at the same moment.

Niagara. Niagara Falls, the loudest natural sound most Americans of the time could name.

ramrods. Civil War rifles were muzzle-loaders. After each shot the soldier poured powder and a bullet down the barrel and pushed them home with a metal rod, which explains the flash of ramrods all at once.

martinet's error. A martinet is a rigidly strict drillmaster; the word comes from Jean Martinet, a seventeenth-century French officer. Farquhar reasons that firing by volley, all together on command, was a drill-book mistake, since one man can dodge a single volley more easily than many separate shots.

diminuendo*. A musical term meaning “growing softer.” Bierce italicizes it: the sound of the cannonball fades as it travels away.

a charge of grape. Grapeshot: a cluster of iron balls fired from a cannon, spreading like a giant shotgun blast at close range.

Aeolian harps. A wooden box strung with strings that sound when the wind passes over them, named for Aeolus, the Greek keeper of the winds. Popular in the nineteenth century, it made an eerie, wavering music.

now he sees another scene. Here Bierce shifts from the past tense into the present. It is the only such shift in the story.

Questions for Discussion

1. Part I describes the hanging in the language of military procedure. What does that cool, exact voice make you feel, and why might Bierce, a former soldier, have chosen it?

2. Part II ends with a single short sentence. How does it change your view of Farquhar, of the soldier at the gate, and of the order posted “everywhere”?

3. Looking back, where are the first signs in Part III that something is wrong with the escape? When did you notice them?

4. Bierce tells us plainly that Farquhar owns slaves and supports secession. Does that knowledge change how much sympathy you feel for him at the end? Should it?

5. The story contrasts official time (the signal, the step, the drop) with the time inside Farquhar’s mind. What does that contrast suggest about how a state carries out an execution and how a person experiences one?

6. Many later books and films borrow the device of a story that continues past the moment of death. Why do you think this story’s version has lasted so long?

About Ambrose Bierce

Ambrose Bierce was born on June 24, 1842, in Meigs County, Ohio. He enlisted in the 9th Indiana Infantry at the start of the Civil War, fought at Shiloh in April 1862, and rose from private to officer. He suffered a severe head wound at the Battle of Kennesaw Mountain in June 1864.

After the war he settled in San Francisco, where he became one of the most feared and admired journalists of his day, writing for The Wasp, The Argonaut, and the San Francisco Examiner. His war stories and tales of the supernatural, collected in Tales of Soldiers and Civilians (1891, later titled In the Midst of Life), include "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge" and "Chickamauga." His satirical Devil's Dictionary first appeared in book form in 1906 as The Cynic's Word Book.

In 1913, at the age of seventy-one, Bierce traveled into revolutionary Mexico. His last known letter was dated December 26, 1913, from Chihuahua. He was never seen again.

Sources and Further Reading

Ambrose Bierce, “An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge,” Project Gutenberg eBook #375 https://www.gutenberg.org/ebooks/375

“An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge,” Wikipedia (first publication, adaptations, literary antecedents and influence) https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/An_Occurrence_at_Owl_Creek_Bridge

“An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge,” Encyclopaedia Britannica (collection history) https://www.britannica.com/topic/An-Occurrence-at-Owl-Creek-Bridge

David M. Owens, essay on the story’s setting and Bierce’s service (1994), via eNotes https://www.enotes.com/topics/occurrence-owl-creek-bridge/criticism/david-m-owens-essay-date-spring-1994

National Park Service, “Three Stories by Ambrose Bierce” (publication details) https://home.nps.gov/frsp/planyourvisit/upload/2021_Book-Club_Bierce-Short-Stories.pdf

“Ambrose Bierce,” Wikipedia (biography) https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ambrose_Bierce

More Classics from Mike Vendetti

The Metamorphosis: A Modern Retelling by Franz Kafka
https://www.amazon.com/dp/B0HDTK98TG

Beowulf: A Modern Retelling
https://www.amazon.com/dp/B0GZY6JCYF

The Art of War: A Plain-English Adaptation by Sun Tzu
https://www.amazon.com/dp/B0HHZT18DS

The Homecoming: A Modern-Prose Adaptation of Andreas Latzko's Heimkehr (1917)
by Andreas Latzko
https://www.amazon.com/dp/B0H4LN4ZMJ

If this story stayed with you, a short review on Amazon helps other readers find it.